ASTLEY'S TRANSFERRED TO NEW-YORK.

Grand opening of the great Equestrian Troupe.

On MONDAY EVENING, Jan. 16, 169.

The Proprietor, in offering to the public of New-York his troupe of young and taiented artists, begs to assure those who bence him with their patronage that the entertainments he proposes to give will be in every respect of the very highest class known to the equestrian profession. The performers brought another him to this country—many of whom are of world wide colority—have been selected from the elite of the principal European companies, is cleding the strength of Astley's Royal Amphithesies, London, of which he was the late proprietor. The acress are the most heautiful and thoroughly trained in their art; the troupe of Shetland and Weash Ponies the most intelligent and diminutive ever introduced in the circle. These, to gether with his immense wardrobe properties and trappings—magic rins, an improvement show all price—the colossal and gorgeously decerated chariots, and other costly paraphersalis, have been brought out in successive steamers at an aimost incrediths outlay, and, happily, with her trifling loss.

The proprietor flatters himself that the public will take into consideration the marnitude of his enterprise, and the many difficulties to be overcome in order to secure its successful consummaries; and he also dares hope that the well-carned fame of his father. Thomas Cook, who preceded him, and whose earliest triumphs were in the City of New York, some twenty-five years ago, and upon whose model the present troups is organized, may not be forgotten by the admires of equestrian atill, and that his efferts to produce novelty, bleuded with refined art and magnificence, may be duly appreciated.

WILLIAM COOK.
